

I would like to stress that the Indiana law concerning telephone solicitation has made being at home with my family much more rewarding. I believe in free speech, but I also think that advertising should stop when it reaches my door. I can turn off the TV and the radio, but I could not prevent telemarketing until Indiana passed its Telephone Privacy law.

It should be left as is, and not superceded nor made redundant with a weaker law. Telemarketing is depriving too many Americans of their right to pursue happiness, especially in the provacy of their own homes.

Peter Machon, Westfield, IN